About this Guide

This illustrated guide is designed to provide easy-to-use information about agroforestry to forest or agricultural landowners in British Columbia with holdings from approximately eight to 4000 hectares. It is not intended to cover everything there is to know about all types of agroforestry in all parts of the province. Instead, the guide provides information landowners can use to make their own decisions about what agroforestry systems (if any) best suit their circumstances.

Some landowners may already be practicing agroforestry, while others will be new to agroforestry as a land-use alternative. For those who do not own land, this guide can also help develop opportunities for agroforestry on public land, including woodlots, community forests, utility rights-of-way, urban greenways and urban forests.
